The cognate with OCelt ɔrstanom*, whence Gaulish esom pounds in esamo-, Olr iarn (ir iarann, iarum, Gael iasunn), Manx yiarn; OWelsh haearn =hayarn =hayarn, Corn hoern, Obreton hoarn, now houarn, pl hern The ulterior etymology of the Celto-Teut isarno is unceratain, the relationship of the various types in Eng and the cognate languages involves many difficulties The full Eng type (=OHG, ON isarn was isern, found only in OE, though still in the 11th c The form isen, corresp to later OHG isarn, MHG iesen, Ger eisen, MDu ijzen, extends from OE to the 14th c in Kentish and perh other south dialects at length reduced to yse, then in the womb ymonger see IRONMONGER. The long type iren has no continental parallel, in OE, as a simple sb, it was app chiefly poetic, but it became the standard form in ME, the second syllable was from the 14th c variously spelt en yn, ain, and from early in the 16th c always on, the old forms being those long yron, on which iron gradually gained, and became the only one in use. In early ME southern dial, iren was reduced to ire, yre found in literature in 13th c, and still the s w dialect form from Berkshire to Cornwall In north dial, on the other hand, iren was compressed to irn, yrn, still used as irn, irne, ern, airn, in Sc and north Eng dial (see Eng Dialect Dict s v) In the standard Eng form the i-prefixing-tion app did not take place until after diphthongation of the i whence through a phonetic series i ren, ai ren, ai rn, ai ən, came the existing ai ən, dial ai ən of the syncopated pa pples born, borne, to-torn, worn, holn, swoln, and Sc. fal'n, fawn, from earlier born, toren, worn, bollen, swollen, fallen, fawen, 16th c. dial spellings arn, yern, yirn, are ambiguous in some cases they may have meant ren, ai ən, in others yern, yarn, the latter prob from Norse jarn, Da. jern. The plural yrnes, irnes (ys, -esse, etc) could arise alike from yrn, irn, or from iren, iren (as in heven, hevnes)

The form of the original isarn has been much discussed, it has been variously taken as a neuter plural or perhaps adj form, and suggestions made of its relation to its e with the notion of 'glowing' or 'fire', ex Goth ais OHG ei, OE æsa, but no neither case with much probability Some class it among the Ide-eur neuter n words with r in nom sing and n in oblique cases eg Skt ásthar gen ásthnas, Lat iecur, iecinis, and suppose an orig nom i-sar*, gen i-snos* (yielding by Verner's Law i-zar-as*), whence the later forms in r and (by confusion with -as) -es. The Celtic loanwords iarn, etc, and cognates is also doubtful Grimm and others suggested a borrowing of the iron, giving OE iarn, iren, isern, others with Eisen from iron through eran*, earn, ærn (See Müller in Pl's R Beiträge VII 547, Noreen in Askiv for Nordisk Filologi IV 110 note, Abrahamson gramm Untt Lehre 193) Uncertainly also attaches to the phonetic history of Ob iren whether it merely arose by chotacism from isen, or from isern through an intermediate irern, shortened like ærern, ærn, cnaterra, cnaterla]

1. A metal, the most abundant and useful of those used in the metallic state, very variously employed for tools, implements, machinery, constructions, and in many other applications

Pure iron is soft and of a silvery white colour, but is scarcely known, the metal as commonly used has always an admixture of some other substance, usually carbon, and varies in colour from tin white to dark grey It is of three kinds, differing in the proportion of carbon present, and in properties malleable iron, or WROUGHT IRON, which is comparatively soft, very tenacious, fusible only at a very high temperature, and capable at a red heat of being hammered or rolled into any required shape, CAST IRON, which is hard and brittle, and fusible at a lower temperature; and STEEL, which partakes of the properties of both Iron is very rarely found native, (the known instances being mostly of meteoric origin), but is obtained from its ores, which are chiefly oxides or salts of the metal Chemically, iron is a metallic element symbol Fe (Ferrum), atomic weight, 56 In alchemy it was represented by the sign for the planet Mars (♂)

Iron (ɔi·əɹn), a Forms see IRON sb [OE. ísern, ísen, íren, for ísern-en*, etc, corresp to Goth eisarn eins, OHG îsarn-în, îsern-în, MHG îser în, îser en, îser n, Ger eiser-n, MDu iser-ijn, -in, -en, Du. ijzer-en

The OE forms, though identical in the nom with the sb (app through loss of the adj ending en, after n of the sb) were real adjs, so inflected and entering into concord with sbs, as seen in sense 1 During the ME period the inflexions disappeared, first in the northern dialect, and last in the south (where the pl in e survived to c 1400) The adj was thenceforth indistinguishable from the attributive use of the sb (as in gold, silver, brass, for golden, silvern, brazen), which again is largely owing to resolution of OE compounds such as íren bend, íren byrne, ísern scur, etc, but the feeling of its being an adj often permits the use of iron in senses and constructions in which it is parallel to golden, brazen, rather than to gold, brass But in most modern uses it is impossible to distinguish it from the sb used attrib, from which it is here separated on historical grounds. An actual derivative adj is found in IRNEN]

The simple ieg = OHG. awwa, ouwa, MHG. ouwe Ger. aue, au, corresponded to Gothic type ahwiwo*, ahwjō, a substantivized fem. of an adj. derived from ahwa 'water' (OS. and OHG. aha, OFris. and ON. á, OE. ēa), with sense of 'pertaining to water', 'watery', 'watered', and hence 'watered place, meadow, island'. A cognate compound frequent in OE. was ēaland, lit 'water-land', 'river-land', and a deriv. of the simple ieg, ēg, exists in eyot, ait. The ordinary ME. and early mod. Eng. form was iland, ilond. (Iland in 14–15th c. may repr. OE. ēaland or eyland.) In 15th c. the first part of the word began to be associated with the synonymous ile, yle (of Fr. origin), and sometimes analytically written ile-land, and when ile was spelt isle, iland erroneously followed it as isle-land, island, the latter spelling became established as the current form before 1700.

-ism, suffix, repr F -isme, -ismus, a Gr -ισμός, forming nouns of action from verbs in -ίζειν, e g βαπτίζειν to dip, baptize, βαπτισμός the action of dipping, baptism An allied suffix was -ισμα(τ-), which more strictly expressed the finished act or thing done, and which in some cases is the source of modern -ism

Besides its free use as a suffix forming vbs on ordinary sbs and adjs, -ιζω was as mentioned under -ιζειν affixed to national names, with the sense to act or 'play' the people in question, and hence to act like, do after the manner of practise the habits, customs, or language of, side with or adhere to the party of, those people Hence the sb -ισμος had the sense of acting or doing like, siding with adhesion to, or speaking like the people or party of, e g Αττικίζειν to Attilize, to side with the Athenians, to use the Attic dialect, hence Αττικισμος, Atticism, a siding with Athens, Attic style of language, etc In the LXX (Sweet viii 17) and N T have Ἰουδαΐζειν to Judaize, to live like the Jews The derivative Ἰουδαισμός Judaism, the manner of the Jews, occurs in the LXX (2 Macc ii 21) and N T The Latin Judaizismus occurs in Tertullian (c 200), Judaizare in the Vulgate (Origen (c 250) has Χριστιανίζειν to play the Christian, act the part of a Christian, practise Christian principles, and Justin Martyr (a 150) has Χριστιανισμός the practice of Christians, Christianity Hence late L. Christianizare in Tertullian, christianismus in Tertullian, Augustine and Jerome On the type of these, -ισμός -ismus, became the ordinary ending to form names of religious, ecclesiastic, or philosophical systems, the βαπτισμος is cited by Du Cange from a council of 744 The OE repr of this, fulluhtinc, fulluhtung (with c for s is prob. the earliest F. example, and appears in Fog as baptisme, baptism in the 15th c But, in the modern form and sense, Judaïsme is found a 1500, and christianisme (a 1500 in Pr) c 1595 in Eng From the 16th c such formations are numerous.

The following are the chief uses of the suffix

1 Forming a simple noun of action (usually accompanying a vb in -IZE), naming the process, or the completed action, or its result (rarely concrete), as in agonism, aphorism, baptism, criticism, embolism, exorcism, magnetism, mechanism, mesmerism, organism, plagiarism, ostracism, syllogism, synchronism, volcanism To this group in Gr. belonged asterism

b Allied to these, though with affinities to 2, are words in which -ism expresses the action or conduct of a class of persons, as heroism, patriotism, despotism, and the more colloquial blackguardism, busybodyism, despectadorism, priggism, scoundrelism, also the condition of a person or thing, as barbarism, deaf mutism, orphanism, anomalism, mediævalism, parallelism; also Daltonism, with such nonce-words as bar-mandism, old maidism; all-roundism, cleverism, devil-may-care-ism, will to do ism

These pass into terms of more or less temporary currency, as Berkeleyism, Bonapartism, Jeremy Benthamism, Cæsarism, Chartism, St Simonism, with nonce words formed ad libitum, as John Bullism, Robert Elsmerism, Mahdiism, and others designating the cult of a person or family, as Bonapartism, Bourbonism, Brownism, Gladstonism, Lancastrianism, Salisburyism, Stuartism, etc

b More of the nature of class-names or descriptive terms, for doctrines or principles, are agnosticism, alterism, amenism, arianism, bimetallism, deism, egoism, egotism, empiricism, evangelism, fanaticism, feminism, heathenism, hedonism, idealism, imperialism, jingoism, libertinism, monachism, naturalism, opportunism pædobaptism, paganism, polytheism, realism, romanticism, sansculottism, scepticism, stoicism, theism universalism

These lead the way to nonce-formations of many kinds, often humorous, of which the following are specimens chiefly from newspapers anti slaveryism, anti statechurchism anti whole hogism can't help myself ism, know nothingism, Little Peddlingtonism (= Dotsin other desism, nothing arminian, ugly-century ism, what-is-ism, I. R. Baim, Primrose Jingoism, red tapeism, Rule-Britannia museum, self ism

Ism (i·z'm), quasi sb [The prec suffix -ism used generically as an independent word] A form of doctrine, theory, or practice having, or claiming to have, a distinctive character or relation chiefly used disparagingly, and sometimes with implied reference to schism

b. In Chemistry sometimes prefixed to the name of a compound substance to denote another substance isomeric with it

The simple name having originally been given to one such substance, an isomer of it, when found to exist, is distinguished by the prefix iso-, but in some cases the first-discovered substance is not the simplest or normal form, and is itself properly designated the isotype, when the normal form is subsequently discovered, thus the first known butyl alcohol is now known as isobutyl alcohol, a normal butyl alcohol having been subsequently obtained The number of such isomers is unlimited, and while to a constant increase, as new isomeric forms of known compound bodies are discovered Examples are iso amyl or iso pentyl (obs), iso butane, iso butyl or iso tetryl (see Butyl), iso butylate, iso butylic, iso butyric (see Butyric), iso cajeputene (Cajeputene), iso caproic (Caproic), iso cholesterin (Cholesterin), iso cyanate (= carbamine), iso heptane, iso hexane, iso-hydrobenzoin, iso propyl (Propyl) or iso trityl, iso urea (Urea) are a few distinct cases

This was the sense in which the term was introduced by Berzelius, but many later chemists (e g Wurtz in Watts Dict Chem 1865) have applied it in a wider sense, so as to include also the polymeric compounds of Berzelius, i e those which have the elements in the same proportions, but the number of atoms in one a multiple of those in the other, e g butyric acid $C_4H_8O_2$ and aldehyde C_8H_8O, by these the isomeric compounds of Berzelius have been distinguished as metameric More recent authors again (e g Tilden in Inorganic Chem 1886) have used these terms more narrowly, subdividing the isomeric Berzelius into isomeric strictly so called, and metameric, the former being compounds of the same molecular composition, which exhibit the same or closely similar decompositions and transformations, when subjected to the action of the same re agents, such as the C_6H_{14} hydrocarbons, the glucoses, the tartaric acids, etc, the latter, those which exhibit dissimilar transformations under similar circumstances, as propionic acid, methyl acetate, and ethyl formate $C_3H_6O_2$

+3 attrib, corresponding to F -issue, L -issus, Gr -ιστής, forming agent-nouns from verbs in -ίζειν (see IZE, consisting of the agential suffix -ιστης added to the verb stem, as in Βαπτίζ-ειν to dip, Βαπτισ-τής dipper, L baptista, F baptiste baptist cognate to the suffix -ιστικός, -ιπος

Examples of this use are ἀγωνιστής combatant, competitor, λογιστής calculator, πολεμιστής warrior, σοφιστής clever man, sophist, κιθαριστής player on the cithara, ποιητής poet, ῥαψῳδιστής reciter, ὑποκριτής drammer, actor, σπονδιστής a partisan of Athens, one who Atticizes, ἑλληνιστής a Hellenizer, one who speaks Greek, λακωνιστής one who sides with or imitates Lacedæmon, or uses laconism A few words of this form were taken into Latin during or soon after the classical period, e g citharista, cymbalista, flautista (whence F joueur de flute, flutiste), histrionista (whence F joueur de flute, flutiste), histrionista (whence F joueur de flute, flutiste), sophista tympanista, the number of these was greatly increased by Christian writers, in the latinizing of scriptural and ecclesiastical terms, such as agonista, baptista, catechista, collyrista, evangelista, exorcista, psalmista, tocsista In later use, -ista became a favourite formative of names denoting the observers of a particular rule, the holders of special religious or philosophical tenets, or the adherents of particular teachers or here siarchs, but such names as Catharista, Gregoriana, Platonista, and in scholastic use Scotista, Thomista, nominalista, realista, etc Hence the suffix (with the needful adaptations, F -iste, Eng and Ger -ist, etc) has passed into the modern languages In English, its use has received a wide extension, it being now used not merely as the agent-noun to -ize (as beside IZE), as in conformer, plagiarist, and in association with nouns of action or function in -ism, as in altruism, altruist, but also, on the analogy of these, in multitude of forms, having no corresponding words in -ize or -ism, which denominate the professed followers of some leader or school, the professional devotees of some principle, or the practisers of some art In some cases, the form in -ist approaches closely to the native agent noun in -er, being distinguished only by the more professional or systematic sense which it implies e g conformer, conformist, copier, copyist, cycler, cyclist, philologer, philologist Many of the sbs in -ist give rise to adjs. in -istic, -istical, but words of modern formation are to a great extent used adjectively unchanged, as in the royalist party, a Bonapartist plot, nonconformist principles.

The following are the chief modern English uses of the suffix

1 Forming a simple agent-noun derived from a Gr verb in -ίζειν, and often accompanying an Eng. verb in -ize Such are agonist, antagonist, baptist, catechist, epstomist, evangelist, exorcist, apologist, plagiarist, ostracist, syllogist

2 Designating a person who practises some art or method, or who prosecutes, studies, or devotes himself to some science, art, or branch of knowledge, originally expressed by a word of Greek formation in -ία (Eng -y), -μα(τ) (-ma, -m), -η -ε), etc, but in later examples, also by words of Latin or other origin Such are archæologist, chronologist, economist, etymologist, genealogist, geologist meteorologist, mineralogist, mythologist, philologist, physiologist, zoologist, alchemist, algebraist, anonymatist, botanist, chemist, medallionist, microscopist, phlebotomist, physicist, physiognomist, theorist, academist, chirographist, monopolist, rhapsodist, symmetrist, bigamist, monogamist, polygamist, dogmatist, dramatist, epigrammatist, schematist, etc To these may be added (from I sources) annalist, capitalist, journalist, moralist, numismatist, literalist, moralist, satirist, scientist (L. scientia), etc

These have a possible verb in -ize, often in use e g anatomist, botanize, dogmatize, dramatize, economize, categorize, journalize, monopolize, moralize, theorize, etc

3 Designating an adherent or professor of some creed, doctrine, system, or art, which is usually denominated by a cognate -ism e g altruist (a professor of altruism), animist, atheist, Charlist, deist, egoist, egotist, hedonist, monothelist, pedobaptist, polytheist, ritualist, ventriloquist, etc, with a large number derived from personal names, as Bonapartist, Brownist, Buddhist, Calvinist, Darwinist, Hattemist, Scotist, Spinozist, Thomist, Wyclifist, and nonce-words without limit, as I Lambist, Lockeist, Stuartist, Wiesmannuist, etc.

b Formed on an adjective (usually also with a cognate sb in -ism and often as adj) in -istic), as devotionalist, externalist, fatalist, formalist, humanist, idealist, imperialist, loyalist, materialist, naturalist, nominalist opportunist, pluralist, positivist, purist rationalist, realist, royalist, socialist, universalist

4 Formed from other sbs (chiefly Latin) without accompanying words in -ize or -ism, and denoting one whose profession or business is connected in some with the thing or subject in question, as amorist, artist, canonist, casuist, colourist, decretist, dentist, duellist, fashionist, florist, humorist, jurist, linguist, medallist, novelist, numerist, oculist, opinionist, organist, querist, statist, tobacco(n)ist Also from names of languages, as Americanist, Anglist, Germanist, Hebraist, Latinist, Orientalist, Romanist Sometimes, from vbs, as conformist, confutist, controvertist, favourist, impartist, separatist specutatist

b These lead the way to modern formations from current words of all kinds and even from phrases, as balloonist, billiardist, bimetallist, cellist cocainist, cyclist, fetishist, golfist, with small nonce-formations as hammerist, selfist, semi-finalist, truthist, great author, physical forcist, red tapist, second adventist, etc

Words in -ist are treated, according to their importance, in their alphabetical places, or under the Main words on which they are formed, the following are illustrations of some of more trivial or ephemeral character, nonce-words, and the like

He During the ME period, hit lost its initial h first when unemphatic, and at length in all positions in Standard Eng, dialectally, the h was preserved to a much later period, esp in the north, and in Sc hit is still the emphatic, and it ('t, 'd) the unemphatic form Dialectally or colloquially, and to some extent in the literary language (though less now than formerly), it is further reduced in certain positions to I (e. g. 'tis, 'twas, 'twere, is't, was't, do 't, is 't, on 't, which in some dialects becomes, esp after a long vowel, 'd While in the masc the original acc hine was supplanted by the dative him, in the neuter, on the contrary, the dative him gradually yielded to the acc form hit, it This was not yet complete in the beginning of the 17th c. In the 16th c the tendency arose to restrict the pronoun his to the masculine gender, or rather to the male sex For the neuter was substituted the periphrasis thereof or of it (mod dial o't, o'd), also the uninflected nom -acc. form it (used in N. dial from 14th c, and still common in Lancash and parts of Yorksh ,, and finally c 1600 a new facititous genitive (possessive) it's, ITS The plural neuter has always been in Eng the same as the pl masc. Who was it? It is a diamond, a rare ferm, a wold boor, It is I, It was John.* Often when a relative clause implied when not actually expressed, as Who is it (that knocks)? What is it (that is wanted)? What was it (that excited your attention, that did this, etc)? It was the king (who appeared, who so acted, etc.) So Fr ce, Ger es

Formerly the verb agreed (as in German) with the following sb or pron, thus It ant I = It is I, it ant he = it is he), it were two dragons When a relative clause is appended, the relative being the subject, its verb still agrees in number and person with the pronoun It is I who am a traitor It was they who were wrong, not we

4. When the logical subject of a verb is an infinitive phrase, a clause, or sentence, this is usually placed after the verb, and its place before the verb is taken by it as 'provisional' or 'anticipatory subject'.

When the order of th. clauses is reversed, it is omitted, but sometimes rhetorically retained

a With an infinitive phrase

In OE the infinitive was in the dative governed by to, and its construction was rather that of the I. supine in -um after an adj, but this has passed without break into the present use

9 It is often used as an indefinite object of a transitive verb, e g to carry it, fight it, face it, bear it, so in imprecations, as confound it! hang it! Also of an intransitive verb, e g to go it, run it, trip it, ride it, flaunt it And in this way verbs are formed which are in essence upon nouns, with the sense to do, act, or play the person or character to use the thing, e g to king it, queen it lord it, fool it, boat it, cab it, coach it, tram it, etc The use now is colloquial

App first used with transitive vbs, and with adv out, to fight it out the earliest instances, Merry Wives and Much Ado, are omitted, and the usage extended through amphibolous to unit intransitive vbs, as to flaunt it out to flaunt it Through vbs having obs of the intransitive form, as to strut, which is extended to other obs as king queen, etc. There may have been some influence from do it as a substitute, not only for any transitive vb and its object, but for an intransitive vb of action, as in 'he tried to swim, but could not do it', where it is the action in question

Both the masc and fem forms were extensively used in forming technical names of natural products, diseases, etc.

A frequent use in Gr was to form ethnic and local designations, as Ἀθηναῖος Absenite, Σταγειρίτης Stagirite, Συβαρίτης Sybarite, Ταρταρίτης denizen of Tartarus. Hence, often used by the LXX to render Heb names in -י, I, as in Ἰερουσαλὴμ Israelite, Ἀμαληκίτης Levite, Ἀμαληκίτης Amalekite, Ἰσμαηλίτης Ishmaelite, Μωαβίτης Moabite, Σοδομίτης Sodomites, etc Later, in Christian use, in the names of sects, styled either after their locality, their founder, or some tenet, rite, or other characteristic, as ὁρκωτῆται a desert-dweller, eremite, hermit, Νικολαΐται Nicolaitans (pl), Ἰακωβῖται Jacobites, Μονοφυσῖται Monophysites, etc Some of the Greek terms (esp those in Christian use) were adopted in Latin, either unchanged in -ītē or often in -ita, the plural (which was more frequent in use) being in -ītæ than Magnētītæ, Sybaritæ, and, in the Vulgate, etc, Levītæ or Levīta Israelītæ, Ismaelītæ, Ammonītæ, Moabītæ, Nicolaïtæ, Sodomītæ (also Godolīæ, Recabītæ, etc, where the I XX have Γαδδί, Ῥαββάν), and in later and mediæval writers Marcionītæ, Arianītæ, Cynicītæ, Manichæītæ, Monophysītæ, etc Hence the suffix has passed into Fr and Eng in the form -ite pl -ites Already in the metrical Genesis & Exodus c1250 we find Amonit, Arabit, by Wyclif the Vulgate words in -ītæ are duly rendered by forms in -ites, -yte In later Biblical version the ending is extended to other tribal names, e g Amalekites, Kenytes, Vulg Amorræi, Chananæi, Wyclif Amorites, Chananeȝ (-eȝ) 16th c versions Amorites, Canaanites

Another frequent use of the termination was to form names of minerals and gems (adjectively with Adoc stone under stood), e g καρβουνίτης anthracite, αἱματίτης blood stone, hæmatite, ὀφίτης snake-stone, serpentine, σαπφειρίτης moon stone, selenite, etc Newly all these occur also in L in Pliny, who moreover adds several not recorded in Greek These have been handed down and increased by mediæval and early modern Latin writers de proprietatibus rerum, and have given origin to our modern use of -ite in names of fossils and minerals

The following are the chief English uses of the suffix

1 Forming names of persons (Often also used adjectively)

a In words already formed in Gr or L, of the classes above mentioned, and in analogous terms, e g Aegyrte, Sybarite, Israelite, Levite, Ammonite, Amorite, Benjamite, Canaanite, Gadite, Gileadite, Hamite, Ishmaelite, Rechabite, Reubenite, Semite, Sodomite, etc, exemite, Phonite, Adamite, Jacobite, Marcionite, Masonite, Azymite, Monophysite, Anthropomorphite, Patumite, etc

b In words of modern formation (a) Denoting an inhabitant of a place, as Sydneyite, Claphamite, Dunhamite, Ludlowite rare, and usually somewhat contemptuous (b) Denoting a disciple, follower, or adherent of a person or doctrine, as Wycliffite, Campbellite, Dalcite, Glassite, Irvingite, Puseyite, Simeonite, Brontëite, Darwinite, Hugoite, Ruskinite, Shelleyite, Spenserite, Zolaite, Byronite, Cunningerd, Heatherd, Jacobite, Macdonaldite, Parmellite, Peelite, †Williamite (adherent of William III) So Pre-raphaelite, Strivelite, Independent Labourite, etc

These have a tendency to be depreciatory, being mostly given by opponents, and seldom acknowledged by those to whom they are applied The following are illustrations of some of these formations

1828 Scott Hist of Scotl xviii, I am not a Mac Millanite or a Russelite, or a Hamiltonian, or a Hurleyite, or a Howdenite (Note, All various species of the great genus Lamentonian) 1830 Lonsdale Mag Aug 390/1 In 1824, the Inghamites churches formed a union with the Daleites church in Scotland 1833 Athenæum 30 Jan 116/3 Of Musset, as becomes a good Huguenot, Hugoite, he has nothing to say 1866 Manch Examiner 13 Jan 3/2 Legislation which is regarded as a violation of that principle by all thorough going Herbert Spencerites 1888 Rider Haggard Col Quaritch I, Other folk, yet more learned, declared it to be an ancient British dwelling Mrs Massey was a British dwellingite 1891 Daily News 5 Mar 5/2 Swift was a Tolerite before he died 1892 Athenæum 1 Oct 444/2 These short stories have not the attractions which the true Zolaite loveth 1895 Times 8 Jun 9/5 Ireland will see Healyites and Redmondites battling with Dillonites for the honour of representing the united will of the Irish nation 1897 Westm Gaz 12 July 1/1 The Shirley country is the Spen Valley no doubt still by Brontëites 1898 Daily News 12 Jan 6/6 The new unseeing meeting of the Independent Labourites.

2 a. Patronyl Used to form the names of fossil organisms, animal or vegetable, as ammonite, belemnite, calamite, dendrite, echinite, encrinite, lignite, trilobite, etc

These follow the type of Gr Βατραχίτης toadstone, etc, and were at first used in their Latin form in -ītæ see the individual words

b Mineral The systematic ending of the names of mineral species, comprising names of ancient origin in -ίτης, as anthracite, hæmatite, ophite, selenite, or in -ītæ, as chlorite, hepatite, hyalite, and a vast number of modern names in which -ite is added to an element expressing colour, structure, physical characters or affinities, or to the name of a locality, discoverer, mineralogist, distinguished scientist, or other person whom the discoverer may have desired to commemorate. Examples are albite, azurite, melanite, dichroite, graphite, apatite, calcite, syenite, labradorite, lead(h)ilite, humboldtite, wernerite, brewsterite, danaite, darwinite Earlier names of minerals have in some cases been displaced by names in -ite, and some names with other endings as ane, in, etc have been conformed to the -ite type For names of rocks, Dana has suggested the differentiated ending -yte, founded on Trachyte, as in aphanyte, dioryte, epodosyte, and the like, but this has not found universal acceptance

3 Anat. and Zool Used to form terms denoting one of the constituent parts, segments, or joints of a body or organ, as in somite a segment of the body, sclerite, pleurite, podite, tergite, a segment of the horn or antenna, side, foot, back, etc Cf cephalostegite, scyopodite, tschiocerite, tschiopodite

[These forms were introduced in French in 1851 by H Milne Edwards (Observations sur la synclette trigonocérale des Crustacées Décapodes, in Ann Sci Nat (Zool) 3, XVI 221) They were app first used in Eng in 1856, by C Spence Bate (Report Brit Assoc 1855, 38 but they owe their general use esp to Huxley (Lect on General Nat Hist 1857, Anat Invertebr Anim 1877, etc) (R A Bather, M A, Brit Mus Museum, South Kensington)]

4 Chem Used to form the names of some saccharine substances, glucoses, and other organic compounds, as damhonite, dulcite, erythrite, inosite, isodulcite, mannite, melampyrite, penite, quercite, sorbite, chiefly f the names of plants, also of explosives, as cordite, dynamite, herculite, melinite, and of commercial products, as chromite, tripolite, etc

[In the earlier of these the suffix was in origin apparently the same as in the preceding groups mannite being, as it were, the distinctive constituent of manna, but in the names of explosives and other products this notion disappears and -ite is merely a derivative]

b In Inorganic Chemistry, -ite is the systematic termination of the names of the salts of acids denominated by adjectives in -ous, e g nitrite a salt of nitrous acid, sulphite a salt of sulphurous acid This was part of the systematic nomenclature introduced by Guyton de Morveau and Lavoisier in their Nomenclature Chimique of 1787

[In this use, the suffix has no direct connexion with the Gr -ίτης, but was suggested by, and differentiated from, the suffix -ate (-ATE 3), appropriated to salts of acids in -ic In the words of the authors cited (Nomencl Chimique, p 40), these are "deux noms différentes adaptées à la même racine, de la manière qui a paru le plus convenable au jugement de l'oreille

Sulphate sera le nom generique de tous les sels formés de l'acide sulphurique

Sulphite sera le nom des sels formés de l'acide sulphureux (p 49) Cette distinction une fois établie nous a donné les nitrates et les nitrites, les phosphates et les phosphites, les acétates et les acétites]

A few of the words in -ite have derivative adjs in -itic, -ite, as Hamitic, Semitic, dendritic, encrinitic, anthracitic, hæmatitic, many of those in group 1 have adjs in -itish, as Israelitish, Mosaïtish

-ite, suffix[2] An ending of adjs adapted from I pa pples in -itus, -ita, of vbs in -ire, -ēre, -ĕre, as in eruditus erudite, exquisitus exquisite, compositus composite, or from the corresponding Romanic -ito, as favourite, also of sbs derived from the same or from the cognate I sbs in -tas, as appetitus appetite Also, of verbs formed from the same pal stems, as cupidite, unite, but from stems in -It, the verbs usually end in -it, as posit, exhibit, merit, this was formerly also usual with adjs, as opposit, reconcilit

Its (its), poss pron [formed in end of 16th c from It + 's of the possessive or genitive case, and at first commonly written it's, a spelling retained by some to the beginning of the 19th c]

The original genitive or possessive neuter was His, as in the masc, which continued in literary use till the 17th c. But with the gradual substitution of sex for grammatical gender in the concord of the pronoun, the indiscriminate use of his for male beings and for inferior animals and things without life began to be felt inappropriate, and already in the ME. period its neuter use was often avoided, substitutes being found in thereof, of it, and in N dialect, the genitive use of het, it, which became very common about 1600, and is still retained in Westmorland, Lancashire, S W Yorkshire, Cheshire, Lincolnshire, and adjacent counties Finally, it's arose, apparently in the south of England (London, Oxford), and appears in books just before 1600. It had no doubt been colloquial for some time previous, and only gradually attained to literary recognition It was not admitted in the Bible of 1611 (which has ther-of besides the his, her, of old grammatical gender), the possessive it occurs once (Lev xxv 5), but was altered (in an edition of 1660) to its, which appears in all current editions Its does not appear in any of the works of Shakspere published during his life time in which and the first folio (where it's occurs 13 times), but there are 9 ex uples of it's, and 1 of its, in the plays first printed in the folio of 1623 In one of these at least (Hen VIII, i 1 8, see I Selden's note) it is prob Shakspere's own (unless he wrote his) By this time it's had become common in literature, from which the passes wise use of it soon disappeared, the neuter his is found as late as 1675 (see His poss pron 3c), the use of the – its con tinued almost as late in literature, and is still dialectal, as is also the periphrastic the – of it (3), as in "the head o't" – its head Its at once after the h of Art had been dropped, the form its is not found in literary use, but it is the em phatic form of it in South Staffordshire, "I'll bend strak Its head")

-ization, suffix forming nouns of action from vbs in -IZE see next

1865 Dickens Mut Fr I xi, He was not aware that he was driving at any ization

-ize (also written -ise), suffix forming vbs = F -iser, It -izare, Sp izar, ad. late L -izāre, izāre, f Gr ἰζειν, formative derivative of vbs.

The Greek verbs were partly intrans, as βαρβαρίζω to play the barbarian, act or speak as a barbarian, side with the barbarians, τυραννίζειν to side with the tyrants, partly trans as καθαρίζων to purify, clean, θησαυρίζειν to treasure up Those formed on national, sectarian, or personal names were primarily intransitive, as Ἀττικίζειν to Atticize in manners, to speak Attic, Φιλιππίζειν to act or speak for Philip, to philippize, Ἑλληνίζειν to 'do' the Greek, act as a Greek, speak Greek, Hellenize also, to make Greek A few words of this form connected with or used in early Christianity, were latinized already in the 3rd or 4th c by Christian writers such were βαπτίζειν baptizāre συναγωγίζειν coangelizāre, κατηχίζειν catechizāre, σκανδαλίζειν scandalizāre, ἀναθεματίζειν anathēmatizāre, χριστιανίζειν christianizāre, ἰουδαΐζειν judaizāre Others continued to be formed both in ecclesiastical and philosophical use e g exorcizāre, dēmonizāre, allegorizāre (Boethius Interpret Aristot), and this became established as the normal form for the latinizing of Greek verbs, or the formation of verbs upon Greek analogies In med L and the mod langs those have been formed also on L or modern national names, and the use has been extended to the formation of verbs from L adjs or sbs This practice prob began first in French, in mod F the suffix has become -iser, alike in words from Greek, as baptiser, évangéliser, organiser, and those formed after them from L, as civiliser, réactionner, humaniser Hence, some have used the spelling -ise in Eng, as in French, for all these words, and some prefer -ize in words formed in French or Eng from L elements, retaining -ize for those of Gr composition But the suffix itself, whatever the element to which it is added, is in its origin the Gr ἰζειν, L -izāre, and, as the pronunciation is also with it, there is no reason why in English the special French spelling should be followed, in opposition to that which is at once etymological and phonetic In this Dictionary the termination is uniformly written -ize (in the Gr ῐ, the ι was short, so originally in L, but the double consonant z (= dz, ts) made the syllable long, when the z became a simple consonant, zdz became tz, whence Eng -ize)

In current English the following groups may be noted

1. Words that have come down from Greek, or have been at some time adopted from Greek, or formed on Greek elements, a. with the trans sense of 'make or conform to, or treat in the way of, the thing expressed by the derivation', as baptize (prob the earliest -ize word in Eng), anathematize, anatomize, apostrophize, canonize, catechize, cauterize, characterize, christianize, crystallize, diphthongize, harmonize, idolize, monopolize, organize, phlebotomize, stigmatize, symbolize, systematize, tantalize; b with the intrans sense 'to act some person or character, do or follow some practice', as agonize, apologize, apostatize, botanize, dogmatize, geologize, philosophize, syllogize, sympathize, theorize.

2 Words formed (in Fr. or Eng) on Latin adjs. and sbs (esp on derivative adjs in -al, ar, an, etc), mostly with the trans. sense 'to make (that which is expressed by the derivation)', as actualize, authorize, brutalize, civilize, colonize, consonantize, devocalize, etherize, etherealize, familiarize, fertilize, formalize, fossilize, humanize, immortalize, legalize, memorize, nationalize, naturalize, neutralize, patronize, pulverize, realize, satirize, scrutanize, secularize, signalize, solemnize, spiritualize, sterilize, terrorize, vocalize, trans or intrans., as cicatrize, extemporize, moralize, particularize, less frequently only intrans, as temporize

3. Words from later sources, as bastardize, foreignize, jeopardize, villanize, womanize trans., gormandize, and such nonce-words as cricketize, pedestrianize, tandemize, intr

4. Words formed on ethnic adjs, and the like, chiefly trans but sometimes intrans, as Americanize, Anglicize, Gallicize, Germanize, Latinize, Romanize, Russianize

5 Words formed on names of persons, sometimes with the intrans Greek sense of 'to act like, or in accordance with', as in Calvinize, Coryatize, but usually in the trans. sense of 'to treat like, or after the method of, or according to the (chemical or other) process of', as in Boucherize, Bowdlerize, Bunsenize, galvanize, Grangerize, macadamize, mesmerize, Rumfordize, with many technical and commercial terms, and nonce-words such as Gladstonize, Irvingize, Joe Millerize, Merry Andrewize, without limit

6 From names of substances, chemical and other, in the trans. sense of 'to charge, impregnate, treat, affect, or influence with', as alcoholize, alkalize, carbonize, de oxidize, hydrogenize, oxidize, ozonize, silverize, etc., so in nonce words, as Londonize to make like London, etc

Verbs in -ize have the usual derivative adjs and sbs, as ppl adj in -ed (often more used than the vb) as 'sensitized paper', ppl. adj. in -ing, chiefly from the intrans use, as 'Judaizing Christians', 'a philosophizing writer', vbl sb in -ing, as 'the Bowdlerizing of Shakspere', agent-noun in -izer (sometimes coexistent with a formation on the Greek type in -ist), as colonizer (colonist), noun of action in -ization (sometimes coexistent with one from Gr in -ism), as civilization, organization (organism)

J

J (dʒē), the tenth letter of the alphabet in English and other modern languages, is, in its origin, a comparatively late modification of the letter I. In the ancient Roman alphabet, I, besides its vowel value in ibidem, milites, had the kindred consonantal value of modern English Y, as in iactus, iam, Iouem, iustus, adiuro, maior, peior. Some time before the 6th century, this y-sound had, by compression in articulation, and consequent development of an initial 'stop', become a consonantal diphthong, passing through a sound (dy), akin to that of our di, de, in adieu, hideous, to that represented in our phonetic symbolization by (dʒ). At the same time, the original guttural sound of G, when followed by a front vowel, had changed to that of palatal g (g, gy), and then, by an advance of the point of closure, had passed through that of (dy, dy), to the same sound (dʒ), so that I consonant and the so called g 'soft' came to have, in the Romanic languages, the same identical value. In Italian, this new sound is represented by g before e and i, gi before a, o, and u. Thus, I gestus, Iesus, iam, iocare, iudicem, are represented in Italian by gesto, Gesù, già, giocare, giudice. But in the other Romanic languages, the letter I was retained with the changed sound, so that, in these, I consonant and g 'soft' were equivalent symbols, distinguished only by derivation. In OF the foregoing words were gest, Iesu, ia, ioer, iuge.

In OE. I consonant, so far as it was used, had (as still in all the continental Germanic languages) its Latin value (y), equivalent to OE ge, gi, or e before certain vowels, thus we find ia, iel, eow, iu, iugoð, iung, as occasional spellings of the words commonly written geā, geōl, eow, geō (giō, giū), geogoð (giogoð), geong (giong, giung). This was especially the case with foreign proper names and other words known through Latin, as Ianuarius, Iob, Iosef (= Jove), Iudea, Iudeus, Iacinþ, and the ethnic name Iātas, Iātan (rarely Lotas), now rendered 'Jutes'. But the French orthography introduced by the Norman Conquest brought in the Old French value of i consonant g 'soft' (dʒ), a sound which English has ever since retained in words derived from that source, although in French itself the sound was subsequently, by loss of its first element, simplified to (ʒ).

From the 11th to the 17th c., then, the letter I is represented at once the vowel sound of i, and a consonant sound (dʒ), far removed from the vowel. Meanwhile, the minuteness and inconspicuousness of the small i, and its liability, especially in cursive writing, to be confounded with one of the strokes of an adjacent letter, had led in mediæval Latin and general European writing, and thus also in English, to various scribal expedients in order to keep it distinct (See I). Among these, an initial i was often prolonged above or below the line, or both, a final i was generally prolonged below the line, and in both cases the prolonged part or 'tail' came at length in cursive writing to be terminated with a curve, thus arose the forms ı, ȷ. The 'dot', used to individualize the minuscule i, was also used with the tailed form, and thus came the modern ȷ. But this was at first merely a final form of i, used in Latin in such forms as 'filij', and in numerals, as j, ij, iij, vj, viij, xj. It was very little used in English, where y had previously been substituted for final s, and it was not till the 17th c. that the device of utilizing the two forms of the letter, so that ı, i, should remain as the vowel, and ȷ, j, be used for the consonant, was established, and the capital forms of the latter, J, J, were introduced.

The differentiation was made first in Spanish, where, from the very introduction of printing, we see J used for the consonant, and I only for the vowel. For the capitals, I had at first to stand for both (as it still does in German type, and in all varieties of Gothic or Black Letter), but before 1600 a capital J consonant began to appear in Spanish. (See, for example, Minsheu's Spanish Dictionary of 1599, where I and J are strictly distinguished, though the I and J words are put in one series.) In German typography, almost from the first, some printers employed a tailed form of the letter J or I initially, to distinguish the consonant sound, but this was by no means generally established till much later. According to Watt (Bibliotheca Britannica), Louis Elzevir, who printed at Leyden 1595–1616, is generally credited with making the modern distinction of I and Y, and J which was shortly after followed by the introduction of U and J among the capitals by Lazarus Zetzner of Strasburg in 1619. In England, individual attempts to differentiate I and J were made already in the 16th c., as by Richard Day, who printed books in London after 1578, and George Bishop, who printed the translation of La Primaudaye's French Academie in 1586, with I, J, U, V, differentiated as in modern use, but had no capital J or U. The J types are not used in the Bible of 1611, nor in the text of the Shakspere Folio of 1623 (but see Jus), these have I for both values, but the latter has a capital Italic J in he ullines in the proper names John Iuliet, Iulius, and in the colophon, list of actors, etc., thus showing a tendency to use this in its origin merely as an ornamental variety of I as a J. In Cotgrave's French English Dictionary printed in 1611 (and in the reprint of it in 1650), the Roman type used for the French has no capital J, and uses I with both values, but it has the small j which is regularly used in the French words thus Iuſtice, Ajuſter. On the other hand, the Italic type, in which the English is printed, has no small j, and uses i for both vowel and consonant, it has the two capitals, I and J, but uses them indiscriminately for the consonant, thus Ioyau in A French, Ioyaulter in A Iacobite. Frequently J is used also for the vowel thus Ingenuitie*ment* Ingenuously, Ingenieux Ingenious. Thus even when the types I and J were at hand, their use was not yet regulated. But during the decade which followed 1630 J or J, as upper case have been gradually added to all fonts of type, and the present usage of restricting I to the vowel, J to the consonant appears to have been generally established soon after 1630. (See, under U and V, the simil ar differentiation of U as vowel, and V as consonant, from the earlier V initial, u medial and final.)

But though the differentiation of I and J, in form and value, was thus completed before 1640, the feeling that they were, notwithstanding, merely forms of the same letter continued for many generations, a vestige of it is still seen in the practice of many persons, who in script write the J form (J) for both J and J, and in the omission by printers of J and U from the signatures of the sheets of books. In Dictionaries, the I and J words continued to be intermingled in one series down to the 19th c. Dr Johnson, indeed, under the letter I, says 'I is in English considered both as a vowel and consonant, though, since the vowel and consonant differ in their form as well as sound, they may be more properly accounted two letters'. Nevertheless, he proceeds to treat them practically as one, his first word I being followed by JABBER, JAM by JAMBICK, and this by JASIN, while the three last words of I are JUXTAPOSITION, IVY, JUNIOR. The same practice was followed by Todd, and by Richardson 1820, and even in some later dictionaries. Joddrell in 1820, Webster in 1828, separate I and J, as independent letters. The name of the letter now jay (dʒē), was formerly jy (dʒi), rhyming with I, and corresponding to French ji, this is still common in Scotland and elsewhere.

In printing manuscripts or reprinting books produced before the differentiation of I and J the earlier I has been treated in two different ways. The earlier editors, in most cases, introduced the modern usage into their texts, changing the I of the archetype, when it stood for the consonant, into J. Later editors more usually aim at reproducing the actual form of the original, and retain I with its twofold value. As our quotations are, in the main, from printed editions of MSS, and in some cases from later editions of printed books, they necessarily reflect these differences of editorial practice, and often show J before the 17th c., it is to be remembered that this is usually due to the edition quoted, not to the original scribe or printer.

But in our chronological lists of Forms, which precede the Etymology and Senses, these editorial J's have been disregarded, and the contemporary I alone given down to the date when J was actually in use.

In some modern edition of MS or Black letter books, in which the minuscule i of the original text is reproduced, we still find a capital J introduced. Thus users probably from the circumstance that the MS or Italic J, or Black letter J, is more like a J than an I in appearance, and is actually still used both for I and J.

No word beginning with J is of Old English derivation. Many are from Latin, chiefly through French, some from Greek, and a few from Hebrew and Arabic. There are also numerous modern words from distant languages, Eastern or Western as jaguar, jalap, jerboa, jungle, junk. Besides these, many familiar or colloquial words of recent appearance and obscure history begin with this letter. On account of the phonetic equivalence of i consonant or j as in jet, jeat, majestie, majesty, magistrate, of which traces still remain in gaol, jail, sergeant, serjeant jelly from I ielée, etc.

The regular and practically uniform sound of the letter J in English is the consonantal diphthong (dʒ). In the word hallelujah (also spelt Alleluiah) it has the sound of Roman i consonant (y). The same sound is retained in proper names or alien terms from German and other languages in which the Roman value of j is retained, as Jena (Yena), Jacobi, Joachim, Jungfrau, junker Janos, Javolan, Jassy. In a few French words, distinctly recognized as alien, j has the French sound (ʒ), as déjeuner, jeu d'esprit. In the transliteration of Oriental names, as Jat, Jehangir, Jan, Jiz, Juggernaut, Jumna, etc., j is used with its English value.

The actual origin is disputed. It has been generally assumed to be the same word as F Jacques, in OF also Jaques, Jaques (= Jackes —late L Jacobus, for Jacobus, Gr Ἰακώβος Jacob) James, also a familiar name for a peasant, a man of the lower orders (cf JACQUERIE) But it has been used in Eng from its earliest appearance as a by name of Johan, Jon, John, and a strong case has been made out by E W B Nicholson, M A., Bodley's Librarian (The Pedigree of Jack and of various allied names, 1893), for its actual origination as a pet form of that word. Cf esp the recognized diminutives Jankin and Jackin (as contained in the surnames Jacken (1327), Jackins, Jackinson), and the relation between Dick and Dickin, Rob and Robin, etc The Scotch equivalent form of the name is Jock, but this has not the transferred senses of Jack]

Jack (dʒæk), sb.[2] [Origin somewhat obscure, but most prob a specific application of JACK sb.[1] (sense 33 b), and of and applied to things of smaller than the normal size, as if short for 'jack-boot']

1 small flag (so called in contradistinction to the ensign) of the various uses of jack for jack bowl, jack-brick, jack fish, etc, also the naval use in jack = jack-cross-trees

Other conjectures have been offered, e.g. that the name is the F. Jacques, James, and that the jack was so called from King James I, who introduced the original union flag, or, that the word is prob identical with JACK sb.[3], the leathern surcoat having been (it is suggested) sometimes emblazoned with the cross of St George But app neither of these conjectures covers the early use of the word]

A ship's flag of smaller size than the ensign, used at sea as a signal, or as a mark of distinction, spec the small flag which is flown from the jack-staff at the bow of a vessel (formerly at the gaff-sail topmast head), and by which the nationality of a ship is indicated, as in British jack, Dutch jack, French jack

In British use the jack has been since the 17th c (except under the Commonwealth) a small sized 'Union Flag' of the period (Union Jack), which has also been, since 1707, inserted in the upper canton of the ensign; hence, the name 'union jack' is often improperly applied to the union flag itself, when this is not carried or used as a jack. Every maritime nation has a jack of its own; this is usually, either as in recent times, in the German Empire, Sweden, and the United States, the same as the canton of the ensign, or, as in France and the Netherlands, identical with the ensign, only smaller

Jack-a-nape or 6-7 Jack(e)an apes (Apes), Jack(e) an apes (-Apes), (? Jack and Apes), 7 Jack an Ape, Jack-an-Ape, 9 jack an ape, jackanape δ 6-7 Iack(o)-anapes, 7 Jacanapes, jackanaps, jackinapes, 7-jackanapes, 7 Jackanape γ? -apes, -apeses, (? apa's) [Prob of Irish origin uncertain

So far as yet found, the word appears first as an opprobrious nickname of William de la Pole, Duke of Suffolk (murdered 1450), whose badge was a dog and chain, such as was attached to a tame ape Hence, in a poem of 1509 (see α 2), in which other noblemen are denominated by their badges or heraldic emblems as the Swan, fiery Cresset, Porcullis, Wheat-ear, etc, Suffolk is styled 'the Ape clogge', and in somewhat later satirical invectives is referred to as an ape, and entitled Jack Napes, this being interestingly already a quasi proper name for a tame ape, as it is seen to be in 1522 (The converse hypothesis, that Suffolk was for some other reason called 'Jack Napes', and thus this nick name was transferred from him to the ape, does not, on a review of the facts, seem probable) But of Jack Napes or Napys, and its relation to ape or apes, no certain explanation can be offered, it was perhaps in its origin, merely a playful or whimsical name for a tame ape, and the n might arise as in nuncle and naps (birds nest, pigs nye), or as in the by names Ned, Nell, Nell, and the t might be in imitation of the s of surnames such as Jukkes, Hobbes, Symmes, etc, already in use, so that 'Jack Napes paraded a human name and surname If this was the standing of the name, it is easy to understand that it might never attain to literary use, till it became the nick name of Suffolk At this as it may, the fact remains that Jack Napes is the earliest form, of which Jack a Napes, Jack of Napes (? Naples), Jack an ape, Jack and Apes, are later perversions, app attempts of 'popular etymology' to make the expression more intelligible In accordance with this view, the original sense is here taken as that of ape, and the name as an ape's name, a derived application, though it is in point of date the earliest use that has come down to us and may possibly, with further research, be found to stand for an ape

The formation appears to be onomatopœic, in some senses it coincides with DAG sb[1] and [3], DAW v [1] and [2], and in some approaches tag and rag

There are no cognates in Teutonic or Romanic, and the Celtic gag 'split, rent, fissure', sometimes compared cannot in our present knowledge be connected phonetically It is possible that the two notions of 'cut or slash', and 'piece', ought to be referred to separate words (cf DAG sb 1 and 3) but in our ignorance of the facts, they are here left together In the vb the sense 'pierce, prick' is essentially northern and is the only sense known in NE

† Jehovah (dʒɪhōu·vă. [The English and common European representation, since the 16th c., of the Hebrew divine name יהוה. This word (the 'sacred tetragrammaton') having come to be considered by the Jews too sacred for utterance, was pointed in the O. T. by the Masorites, יְהוָה, with the vowels ' (= ə), ō, ă, of אֲדֹנָי (adônai), as a direction to the reader to substitute ADONAI for the 'unutterable name,' which is actually done by Jerome in the vulgate translation of Exodus vi. 3, and hence by Luther. Students of Hebrew at the Revival of Letters took these vowels as those of the word יהוה. JHVH, JHVH) itself, which was accordingly transliterated in Latin spelling as IeHoVaH), i.e. Iehouah. It is now held that the original name was IaHUe(H), i.e. Jahveh, or with the English values of the letters, Jahvweh, and one of the forms in which it was generally used by writers upon the religion of the Hebrews. The word has generally been understood to be a derivative of the verb הָיָה hâyâh to be, to exist, as if 'the that is,' 'the self existent,' or the one ever coming into manifestation'; this origin is now disputed, but no conjectured derivation which has been suggested has gained general acceptance.

The following is cited as the first use of the form Jhova (Jha or

Je suit (dʒi·siut), sb. Also 6–7 -ite [ad. med. L. Jesuita, f. Jesus + ita -ite.]

1 A member of the 'Society of Jesus', a Roman Catholic order founded by Ignatius Loyola in 1533, and sanctioned by Paul IV. in 1540.

The object of the Society was to support and defend the Roman Church in its struggle with the tide of Reformation, and to propagate the Faith among the heathen. The strongest organization of the Order soon rendered it very powerful, and brought it into collision with the civil authority even in Roman Catholic countries, from many of which its members have at times been expelled. The secret policy, the organization, and the spiritual principles maintained by many of its representatives, and generally ascribed to the body as a whole, have rendered its name odious not only in England, but in Protestant countries of Europe, and have given rise to sense 2, and to the opprobrious sense attached to Jesuitical, Jesuitry, and other derivatives.

IN OE rendered by hælend saviour (see HEALER), but during the ME period regularly used in its OE (objective) form Iesu (Jesu) the (L nom) form Iesus (Jesus) was rare in ME, but became the regular Eng. form in 16th c. Yet in the Rhemish New Test, 1582, the form Iesus was generally used where the Gr has Ἰησοῦς, the Vulg. the Iesus in the oblique cases. This was, as a rule, retained in the revision, 1535, and in the Great Bible 1539, also in the vocative instances, in the Bishops Bible 1568 but in representing the Gr oblique cases, this has Iesu from the genitive, from the twenty-first century on, and from the Rhemish 1582, and the version of 1611 Jesu was frequent in the earlier forms of the Book of Common Prayer, still surviving in places, in later editions of which it is now generally represented by the abbreviations thu, and thu, thus, or thu, etc see IHS These have been erroneously expanded by modern readers as Jesus, while the latter occurs, occasionally in early (chiefly painted books)

2 Goods thrown overboard from a ship in distress in order to lighten the vessel (and afterwards washed ashore)
The last clause is no part of the etymological meaning but is found as early as 1370, having apparently originated from taking the word as 'that which is thrown or cast ashore by the sea' This is directly opposed to the quot from Coke in sense 1, and its true sense in Les Termes de la Ley. But it is the sense given in recent Law books. Spelman and Blackstone took the meaning as 'merchandises thrown overboard and sunk in the sea'. Both explanations evidently arose in the attempt to distinguish jetsam from flotsam, in the phrase flotsam and jetsam Etymologically flotsam should mean that which is afloat in consequence of a wreck or from the action of the wind or sea itself, jetsam that which has been thrown overboard to save the ship, without reference to whether it floats or sinks
(In quot 1370 the word appears to be used as adj or adv)

Jew's trump, Jew's trump. Now rare. Also 6 Iues trounk 9 dial Jew-trump [An earlier name than the now usual Jews' harp, and formerly equally common in England. In Scotland and N. of England the instrument is still called simply TRUMP, agreeing with the Fr. name trompe. (? Hitherto, which is now how ever mostly displaced by guimbarde, guimbarde from the simple trompe. In this sense has been adduced, it is probable that the name trump came from France, esp. as in the Customs Rates of 1545 they are called Iues trounks a mistranslation perh. due to the fact that the trompe of the elephant is also called in Eng. trunk. The first element in was certainly Jews from the first, perh. because this was an early imitation of jaws or of Fr. jeu, are brackets and inept But the attribution of the instrument to the Jews occurs, so far as is known, only in English, and there is no actual evidence as to its origin

More or less satisfactory reasons may be conjectured as to the first element, but it is actually in fact, sold, or sent to England by Jews, or supposed to be so, or that it was attributed to them, as a good commercial name suggesting the trump and trumpery mentioned in the Bible. Whatever was the name a trump nor a harp, the ingenuity which conferred upon it these names may well have distinguished it as the trump par excellence. See also what is by Rev C. B.
